The Lesson Of Christmas Saving

A friend - who still remembers an old gray mare on a country road outside a small midwestern town at Christmastime - says his most pleasant memory is his Dad piling him into the cab of a pickup truck along with his sister and two brothers.

"We all had money saved for Christmas shopping in town," he recalls with pride.

Saving for shopping trips, and stashing away Christmas money, can teach valuable, life-long lessons.

But there are some simple precautions wise parents should observe:

The limits of a regular allowance teach most kids how to make spending choices. They soon learn to put some cash away for another day.

It's not normal for preschoolers to save every Christmas nickel. So don't encourage saving for savings's sake. Rather, suggest some sensible saving goal - - like five dollars a month for a new bike.

And don't expect a nine-or ten-year-old to save for college tuition. That's too remote to be taken seriously. Only an older child could consider such a goal.

Preschoolers need a little unlocking band - - so they can count their money. Sure, they may spend it all. But they must learn to handle money before they can handle its temptations.

If they're goal-oriented, they'll soon learn to pay themselves first, then use savings for special expenses.

After they've saved 25 dollars - - and learned to sign their name legibly - - the next step is a trip to the bank. Show them how to buy a Savings Bond. Just buying a Bond can reinforce the satisfaction of saving.

Family discussions are the best place for children to learn their valuable financial lessons. You should let them figure up their emergency needs. Teach them how to get maximum saving returns. Explain the automatic ease of your Payroll Savings Plan.
